Introduction: Basic Issues in Group Work

The effort involved in setting up and leading groups is considerable, yet we believe this commitment is essential in facilitating successful groups. Well-run groups provide members with a place to give and receive feedback, to gain insight into their interpersonal dynamics, and to address aspects of their lives they want to change. A colleague of ours once said, "Individuals are wounded in relationships and can heal in relationships." Oftentimes, however, the people who have wounded us are not the people with whom we heal. Group counseling provides a powerful place for healing. Participants can rewrite old scripts that no longer serve them and practice new ways of being in relationship with others. A group can be either a force for healing or a force for harm. Effective group leaders provide a safe place that encourages members to participate fully and to take risks. Groups have much to offer, but designing and facilitating groups in a variety of settings is a complex undertaking. In this book we offer some blueprints for forming and conducting groups in a manner that will release the strivings for health within individuals.

Part One addresses the fundamentals of group work and provides guidelines for beginning your own work as a group leader. These chapters emphasize the importance of developing a personal style of group leadership and conceptualizing an approach to the practice of group work. In our work as group leaders we actively facilitate the group, especially during the beginning and ending phases. Most groups are time limited, and our interventions and structuring are aimed at assisting members to fully use the group process to attain their personal goals. During the initial stage we devote time to teaching members how to get the most from a group experience. Toward the end of a group we assist members in conceptualizing what they have learned so they can maximize their gains and apply new behaviors to everyday life.

CHAPTER LEARNING OBJECTIVES

1. Briefly introduce the major topics of group work
2. Describe the types of groups and other considerations that affect conducting groups in varied settings (CACREP, 2016, Standard F)
3. Identify the key aspects of brief group therapy
4. Introduce some basic ideas of multicultural perspectives on group work
5. Discuss what is involved in becoming a culturally skilled group worker
6. Identify ethical and culturally relevant strategies for designing and facilitating groups (CACREP, 2016, Standard G)

You are a college counselor working in the Educational Opportunity Program with students on academic probation. Several themes are emerging as reasons students tend to have difficulties with their academic performance. You have decided to form a group that will meet each week to help these students succeed academically. What kind of group will you provide—open group, closed group, short-term or long-term group, support group, psychoeducational group, collaborative leadership, structured, unstructured—how will you decide? Think about the problems a first-generation student might be facing from a sociocultural perspective and outline the methods you think would be most effective in addressing these issues in a group setting:

- What issues are these students facing, both internally and externally, at home and within the educational institution?
- Which types of groups would have the greatest impact for these students?
- What strengths do you have as a counselor in working with this population?
- What areas of growth or training might you need to pursue?

Introduction

Groups are an excellent treatment choice for numerous intrapersonal and interpersonal issues and for helping people change. Counseling groups are being offered in all kinds of settings today and for many different client groups. Most are short-term groups designed for specific client populations rather than unstructured personal-growth groups. These groups are designed to remediate specific problems or to prevent problems. Many of the problems that bring people to counseling involve difficulties in forming or maintaining intimate relationships. People often believe their problems are unique and that they have few options for making significant life changes. They may be at a loss in knowing how to live well with the ones they love. Groups provide a natural laboratory and a sense of community that demonstrates to people that they are not alone and that there is hope for creating a different life. As you will see in the chapters that follow, part of the reason groups are so powerful is because participants have the opportunity to try out different strategies for resolving their long-term problems.

LO2

An Overview of Various Types of Groups

The broad purposes of a therapeutic group are to increase members' knowledge of themselves and others, to help members clarify the changes they most want to make in their lives, to provide members with the tools they need to make these changes, and to support their changes. By interacting with others in a trusting and accepting environment, participants are given the opportunity to experiment with novel behavior and to receive honest feedback from others concerning the effects of their behavior. As a result, individuals learn how they affect others.

Different types of groups require different levels of leader competence and training, but all group leaders must have some common basic competencies. It is important to distinguish among group types and purposes, and to deliver those services that the group leader lists in marketing the group, so that potential group members know what kind of group they are considering joining. We identify some different types of groups in the following sections, but there is considerable overlap among these groups. The Association for Specialists in Group Work (ASGW, 2000) has identified a set of core competencies in general group work. These standards make it clear that mastery of the basic knowledge and skills all leaders need to possess does not qualify a group worker to independently practice in any group work specialty. In addition to core competencies, group practitioners must possess advanced competencies relevant to their specialty. The Association for Specialists in Group Work (ASGW, 2000) has identified four areas of advanced practice, referred to as specializations, which we consider next: (a) task groups, (b) psychoeducational groups, (c) counseling groups, and (d) psychotherapy groups.

Task Groups

Task groups (or task facilitation groups) are common in many organizations and agencies, and they include task forces, committees, planning groups, staff development groups, treatment conferences, community organizations, social action groups, discussion groups, study circles, learning groups, school groups, and other similar groups. Task groups are common in community, business, and educational settings. The task group specialist might develop skills in organizational assessment, training, program development, consultation, and program evaluation. The focus of these groups is on the application of group dynamics principles and processes to improve practice and to foster accomplishment of identified work goals.

Both leaders and participants of task groups tend to want to get down to business quickly, but focusing exclusively on the task at hand (content) can create problems for the group. A leader's failure to attend to here-and-now factors is likely to result in a group that becomes riveted on content concerns and has little appreciation for the role played by process issues in the success of a group. If interpersonal issues within the group are ignored, cooperation and collaboration will not develop, interpersonal issues may intensify, and it is unlikely that group goals will be met. It is essential that group leaders recognize that process and relationships are central to meeting the goals in this type of group. One of the leader's tasks is to assist participants in understanding how attention to this interpersonal climate directly relates to achieving the purpose and goals of the group. Learning interpersonal skills for working on a team is enhanced when participants can practice these skills in a group setting (Falco & Bauman, 2014).

Psychoeducational Groups

The psychoeducational group specialist works with relatively well-functioning group members who may have an information deficit in a certain area, such as parenting or anger management skills. Psychoeducational groups focus on developing members' cognitive, affective, and behavioral skills through a structured set of procedures within and across group meetings. The goal is to provide members with targeted education on a variety of psychological issues or informational deficits. This group work specialization deals with imparting, discussing, and integrating factual information. New information is incorporated through the use of planned skill-building exercises. An example of a psychoeducational group is a substance abuse prevention group. Intervention strategies based on psychoeducational formats are increasingly being applied in health care settings (see Drum, Becker, & Hess, 2011; McCarthy & Hart, 2011) and in relationship education with couples (Carlson, Barden, Daire, & Greene, 2014).

Copyright 2018 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. WCN 02-200-202

Although the topics vary, psychoeducational groups share the goals of increasing members' awareness of a life problem and providing skills training to help members cope with situations. These groups can be useful in enhancing or building on members' existing skills. Generally, sessions are 2 hours each week for 4 to 15 weeks. However, some group sessions may be as short as 30 to 45 minutes, especially with children, or for clients who have a shorter attention span or who have only basic cognitive functioning.

Psychoeducational groups fit well into today's managed health care scene because they can be designed to be brief, cost-effective treatments. For similar reasons, schools often use groups as the treatment of choice. These groups are typically time limited and have narrow goals. They often focus on symptomatic relief, teaching participants problem-solving strategies, and developing interpersonal skills that can accelerate personal changes.

Integrating counseling with psychoeducational interventions has been successful in both social and academic development groups in school settings (Steen, Henfield, & Booker, 2014). This combination of group counseling methods provides the opportunity to facilitate self-awareness and to present skills information. Examples include communication and social skills groups, friendship groups, bullying prevention groups, and groups for making decisions about careers. Psychoeducational groups provide opportunities for students to learn new information and skills, and group leaders frequently link members so they can see that others share their concerns (Falco & Bauman, 2014).

At the beginning of a psychoeducational group, members often are asked to complete a questionnaire on how well they are coping with the area of concern. The work of these groups may include structured exercises, readings, homework assignments, and contracts. When the group comes to an end, another questionnaire is completed to assess members' progress. Psychoeducational groups are useful for a broad range of problems, including stress management, substance abuse and sobriety issues, interpersonal violence, anger management, and behavioral problems. In a college setting, resident assistants (RAs) may benefit from psychoeducational groups to help them gain the knowledge and skills needed to problem solve with college students.

The emphasis on learning in psychoeducational groups provides members with opportunities to acquire and refine social skills through behavioral rehearsal, skills training, and cognitive exploration. The intervention strategies used in psychoeducational groups are largely based on the transmission of information basic to making changes and teaching a process for bringing about these changes. The leader's main tasks are to provide instruction and to create a positive and safe climate that fosters learning (Drum et al., 2011). Chapter 10 and Chapter 11 illustrate proposals for psychoeducational groups appropriate for schools and community agencies.

Counseling Groups

The group worker who specializes in counseling groups helps participants resolve the usual, yet often difficult, problems of living. Career, education, personal, social, and developmental concerns are frequently addressed. This type of group differs from a psychotherapy group in that it deals with conscious problems, is not aimed at major personality changes, is generally oriented toward the resolution of specific short-term issues, and is not concerned with treatment of the more severe psychological and behavioral disorders. These groups are often found in schools, college and university counseling centers, churches, and community mental health clinics and agencies.

Counseling groups focus on interpersonal process and problem-solving strategies that stress conscious thoughts, feelings, and behavior. Although the emphasis is on conscious material, it is not uncommon for unconscious material to emerge. The group leader needs to be prepared to deal with what emerges in a way that is congruent with the purpose and goals of the group. Counseling groups may be designed for prevention, development, or remediation purposes. They emphasize interactive group process for those who may be experiencing transitional life problems, are at risk for developing personal or interpersonal problems, or who want to enhance their relationships. A counseling group may help participants resolve problems in living or dealing with developmental concerns. This kind of group also uses interactive feedback and support methods in a here-and-now time frame. The focus of the group often is determined by the members, who are basically well-functioning individuals, and the group is characterized by a growth orientation. Members of a counseling group are guided in understanding the interpersonal nature of their problems. With an emphasis on discovering inner resources of personal strength and constructively dealing with barriers that are preventing optimal development, members expand their interpersonal skills to better cope with both current difficulties and future problems. These groups provide the support and the challenge necessary for honest self-exploration. Participants can benefit from the feedback they receive from others by comparing the perceptions they have of themselves with the perceptions others have of them, but ultimately members must decide for themselves what they will do with this information.

Counseling groups range from those with an open structure, in which participants shape the direction of the group, to those characterized by a specific theme. But they all share these goals:

- Helping people develop more positive attitudes and better interpersonal skills
- Using the group process to facilitate behavior change
- Helping members transfer newly acquired skills and behavior learned in the group to everyday life

The counselor's job is to structure the activities of the group, to see that a climate favorable to productive work is maintained, to facilitate members' interactions, to provide information that will help members see alternatives to their modes of behavior, and to encourage members to translate their insights into concrete action plans. To a large extent, counseling group leaders carry out this role by teaching members about the group process and how they can involve themselves in this process. This instruction includes understanding the norms that govern a group, the level of cohesion in the group, how trust is generated, how reluctance is manifested, how conflict emerges and can be dealt with, what forces bring about healing, how to give and receive feedback, and the various stages in a group's development. Group leaders model appropriate group behavior and help members establish personal goals that will provide direction for the group.

The counseling group becomes a microcosm of society, with a membership that is diverse but that shares common problems. The group process provides a sample of reality, with the struggles that people experience in the group resembling conflicts in their daily life. Participants learn to respect differences in cultures and values and discover that, on a deep level, they are more alike than different. Although participants' individual circumstances may differ, their pain and struggles are universal.

Counseling groups can be designed for children, adolescents, adults, and older people and are conducted in both school and community agency settings. Chapter 10 illustrates counseling groups for children who have been abused, anger management groups for high school students, and a variety of groups typically offered in college and university counseling centers. Counseling groups offered in community settings for specific client groups are organized to assist members in developing coping skills for dealing with a specific problem area. Counseling groups in school or college settings help students explore interpersonal problems, promote positive behavior, improve social skills, obtain support from others, and increase understanding of both self and others. In the college setting, these groups are particularly beneficial for first-year students who may discuss transition or identity issues. Bereavement groups assist people in expressing their grief and making connections with others who are experiencing similar grief reactions. Goals for bereavement groups in schools include normalizing the grief process, helping students to better understand their feelings about their loss, and developing positive ways of coping with loss (Falco & Bauman, 2014).

Chapter 11 includes group proposals for a women's support group for survivors of incest, a men's group in a community agency, a group for interpersonal violence offenders, a substance abuse group, a group for healthy older people, a bereavement group, and a group for institutional older people. Some groups blend features from both psychoeducational and counseling groups, such as a men's group. These groups are often structured around topics or themes designed to assist members in exploring their personal concerns, yet the group also has an educational purpose in that members learn information and can practice skills in dealing with their concerns.

Psychotherapy Groups

The group worker who specializes in psychotherapy groups helps individual group members remediate psychological problems and interpersonal problems of living. Group members often have acute or chronic mental or emotional problems that evidence marked distress, impairment in functioning, or both. Because the depth and extent of the psychological disturbance is significant, the goal is to aid each individual in reconstructing major personality dimensions. Exchanges among members of a therapy group are viewed as instrumental in bringing about change. This interaction provides a level of support, caring, confrontation, and other qualities not found in individual therapy. Within the group context, members are able to practice new social skills and to apply some of their new knowledge. A variety of therapy groups can be found in community mental health agencies, including groups for interpersonal violence offenders.

Copyright 2018 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. WCN 02-200-202

People generally participate in group psychotherapy in an attempt to alleviate specific symptoms or psychological problems such as depression, sexual difficulties, eating disorders, anxiety, or psychosomatic disorders. A variety of methods are employed in the conduct of therapy groups, including techniques designed to symbolically reexperience earlier experiences and methods to work with unconscious dynamics. The therapist is typically interested in creating a climate that fosters understanding and exploration of a problem area. The process of working through psychological blocks rooted in past experiences often involves exploring dreams, interpreting resistance, dealing with transference that emerges, and helping members develop a new perspective on "unfinished business" with significant others.

Brief Groups

LO3

Brief group therapy (BGT) generally refers to groups that are time limited, have a preset time for termination, have a process orientation, and are professionally led. In a time-limited group, clear ground rules are critical, and leaders provide structure for the group process (Shapiro, 2010). Many psychoeducational groups and counseling groups incorporate the characteristics of brief treatment in their groups.

The current increased interest in the various applications of BGT is largely due to the economic benefits of this approach to group work (Shapiro, 2010) and to research evidence pointing to the effectiveness and applicability of brief groups to a wide range of client problems and diverse settings (Piper & Ogrodniczuk, 2004). Brief group counseling is popular in both community agencies and school settings because of the realistic time constraints and the ability of a brief format to be incorporated into both educational and therapeutic programs. Brief groups require the group practitioner to set clear and realistic treatment goals with the members, to establish a clear focus within the group structure, to maintain an active leadership role, and to work within a limited time frame.

Most of the empirical evidence on the effectiveness of group counseling has been based on studies of time-limited, closed groups; evidence from meta-analytic studies strongly supports the value of these groups. In general, the evidence for the efficacy of brief group therapy is quite positive (Shapiro, 2010). In their review of the group literature, Fuhriman and Burlingame (1994) conclude that group therapy (including BGT) consistently results in positive outcomes with a wide range of client problems. Other reviews of the group literature lend a strong endorsement to the efficacy and applicability of BGT as well (see Burlingame, MacKenzie, & Strauss, 2004; Piper & Ogrodniczuk, 2004). BGT is often the treatment of choice for specific problems such as clients with existential concerns, complicated grief reactions, medical illnesses, personality disorders, trauma reactions, or adjustment problems (Piper & Ogrodniczuk, 2004).

Although the clinical benefits of brief group therapy are clear, this approach does have some limitations. This approach should not be thought of as a panacea or as a means of producing lasting personality change. To be effective, BGT leaders must have training in both group process and brief therapy. BGT makes unique demands on group practitioners and requires specialized skills (Piper & Ogrodniczuk, 2004).

A Multicultural Perspective on Group Work

LO4

Culture encompasses the values, beliefs, and behaviors shared by a group of people. But culture does not just delineate an ethnic or racial heritage; it also can refer to groups identified by age, gender, sexual identity, religion, or socioeconomic status. Culture is learned in groups such as families, and when individuals in a group interact, they bring their cultural learning with them. You belong to a particular cultural group (or groups), and so do your clients. Culture will influence the behavior of both you and your clients—with or without your awareness.

Culture will influence the behavior of both you and your clients—with or without your awareness.

Each person approaches participation in a group from his or her own unique perspective. DeLucia-Waack (2010) emphasizes the necessity of developing a set of tools and a way of being with others that adequately respects, addresses, and explores these differences in a therapeutic setting. Increasing your knowledge of your own cultural values and personal assumptions will help you to work effectively with culturally diverse clients. This kind of self-awareness is a necessary, but not sufficient, condition for developing competence in multicultural group work. According to DeLucia-Waack, culturally skilled group counselors need to (1) be aware of their own personal values, attitudes, biases, assumptions, and prejudices; (2) have a general knowledge about the ways the diverse backgrounds of members may affect the group process; and (3) be able to implement interventions that are appropriate for the life experiences of the members of the group.

It is important to discuss with group members how your worldview influences your beliefs and practices about groups and group process. A culturally skilled group leader engages in an ongoing process of self-reflection. Striving for competence involves examining your beliefs about how people learn and change from both a cultural and a theoretical perspective. It is necessary to think about how people from other cultures might view the group process differently. For example, a goal of the counselor may be to have members offer challenging feedback to one another. However, group members from a culture that perceives challenging feedback as a form of aggression or shaming may not be comfortable with this. The leader does not have to discourage assertive communication, but any hesitation on the part of members to use assertive communication should be examined to see if this reluctance can be explained within a cultural context.

Regardless of your ethnic, cultural, or racial background, if you hope to build bridges of understanding between yourself and group members who are different from you, it is essential to recognize your possible position of privilege and the power of your professional role in the group. We hope you will engage in critical thinking and self-exploration pertaining to your ability to connect with clients who differ from you and take steps to increase your capacity to make meaningful connections.

A useful way to think about the differences between our clients and ourselves is to consider the multiple identities each of us possess. Our identities shape the way we view others as well as the ways in which others experience us. Each of us possesses gender, sexual identity, a personality style, abilities/disabilities, socioeconomic status, relationship status, levels of privilege, and parental status. Each of these categories influences how we view the world, who we are, and how we behave, just as it informs the ways people view and interact with us. We bring these personal dimensions of ourselves to our roles as group leaders, and our identity changes and evolves at different stages in our life. Reflect on which identities are most salient for you at this point in your life and consider how they might influence the way you define your role as a group counselor.

Our identities shape the way we view others as well as the ways in which others experience us.

Learning in Action

Identity Reflection

All individuals possess multiple intersecting identities and belong to numerous cultural groups. Some of our identities change or evolve over time, but others are constant. The intersection of our multiple identities is often as powerful an influence as are the individual identities themselves. Place a check mark next to the identities that have the most impact on your life today:

_____ Gender
_____ Sexual orientation
_____ Socioeconomic status
_____ Ethnicity
_____ Cultural practices
_____ Physical ability
_____ Physical health status
_____ Mental health status
_____ Size
_____ Religious affiliation
_____ Familial affiliation (adopted, only child, etc.)
_____ Relationship status
_____ Parental status (mother, father, grandparent, etc.)
_____ Age

_____ Educational level or status

_____ Professional level or affiliation

_____ Political affiliation

_____ Other identities salient for you _____

Discussion

Select one salient identity for examination. Take turns answering each question before you move on to the next one, and discuss your answers in a small group.

1. What are the two most salient identities for you at this time in your life? _____, _____. (Fill in the blanks below with one of these identities.)
2. How do you see yourself as a _____?
3. How do others perceive you as a _____?
4. How much power do you feel you have as a _____?
5. How much power do you think others perceive that you have as a _____?
6. Briefly state which of your identities gives you the most and the least power or status in society. _____
7. The biggest misconception I feel others have about me as a _____ is _____ .
8. How do you feel your identity as a _____ influences your ability to connect to others similar to and different from you?
9. The most painful thing I have heard others say about people who belong to my identity as a _____ is _____.
10. The greatest privilege that comes with being a _____ is _____.

Reflection on Small Group Discussions

1. Were any of your previous beliefs about some of the identities discussed changed, challenged, or confirmed in any way?
2. How might your interactions change based on what you learned from others in your group, or from your own personal insights?

You can work toward becoming culturally responsive to the members of your groups in numerous ways. Through honest self-evaluation, supervision, and feedback from colleagues, you can begin to develop a plan for increasing your multicultural awareness, knowledge, and skills. As with any other area in counselor education, we believe that engaging in your own personal work around issues of diversity and culture is a good place to start your journey. The ideal setting in which to do this work is often one that includes a diverse population. Make a commitment to "lean into your discomfort." I (Cindy) recall feeling many growing pains as I began my work as a multicultural counselor. I was reassured by my mentors and teachers that the insecurities and sometimes great discomfort I often experienced were signs that I was indeed expanding my levels of competence.

There are advantages and limitations when using group formats with culturally diverse client populations. On the plus side, members can gain much from the power and strength of collective group feedback. They can be supportive of one another in patterns that are familiar. As members see their peers challenging themselves and making desired changes in their lives, it gives them hope that change is possible for them.

Make a commitment to "lean into your discomfort."

It is important to realize that groups are not for everyone. Some individuals may be reluctant to disclose personal material or to share family conflicts. They may see it as shameful even to have personal problems, and all the more shameful to talk about them in front of strangers. People from some cultures rely on members of their extended family, their clergy, or indigenous healers for help rather than seeking professional assistance. Some individuals may not feel comfortable in a group or even be willing to be part of a counseling group. Some may be hesitant to join a group because of their unfamiliarity with how groups work. Others may find that what is expected in a group clashes with their cultural values. Counselors and group members together can bridge these cultural divides so that people from all backgrounds benefit from group work.

Again, we want to emphasize that although it is unrealistic to expect you to have an in-depth knowledge of all cultural backgrounds, it is feasible for you to have a comprehensive grasp of the general principles for working successfully amid cultural diversity. It is equally important to have an attitude that includes an appreciation of the fact that not everyone views the world as you do. Although cognitive learning is important, this learning must be integrated with attitudinal and behavioral shifts.

LO5

Becoming a Culturally Skilled Group Counselor

In this section, we present a conceptual framework that organizes diversity, multicultural, and social justice competency into four areas: beliefs and attitudes, knowledge, skills, and action. As you read, try to become more aware of your own worldview, values, beliefs, and biases based on your cultural background. Diversity and cultural issues are important considerations for all clients. If we only examine the impact of culture when working with certain populations, we are likely to miss key elements in understanding and helping our clients. A culturally skilled counselor explores the impact of cultural factors in all aspects of the client's life.

Diversity and multicultural and social justice competence has been incorporated into the code of ethics of many professional organizations. Becoming a culturally skilled group practitioner involves understanding both the differences between people and the common ground we share. To that end, group counselors should strive to do the following:

- Understand some ways that issues pertaining to gender and sexual orientation can be productively explored within the group.

Copyright 2018 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. WCN 02-200-202

- Consider the impact of adverse social, environmental, and political factors in assessing problems and designing interventions in a group.
- Become aware of how power, privilege, social group status, and oppression influence the process of a group.
- Become aware, knowledgeable, skilled, and action-oriented in understanding the worldview of group members.
- Respect the roles of family and community hierarchies within a member's culture.
- Respect members' religious and spiritual beliefs and values.
- Acknowledge the strengths and limitations in working with individuals from privileged and marginalized groups.
- Inform members about basic values and expectations that are implicit in the group process (such as self-disclosure, reflecting on one's life, and taking risks).

A Starting Place: Understanding Your Own Culture

Effective group counselors must have some level of understanding of their own cultural conditioning, the cultural conditioning of their clients, and an awareness of the sociopolitical system of which they are a part. Translated into practice, this means that if you are raised to believe that men and women should be seen as equals, then your worldview will greatly differ from some of the clients you will encounter. If you are not able to recognize that your values are not absolute truths, but products of your cultural upbringing, then you will likely impose your own worldview and values on your group members and possibly do harm. However, we need to be careful about determining what is problematic, especially if it is based on our own standard of what we consider to be healthy and unhealthy.

DeLucia-Waack (2014) points out that each culture has its own set of beliefs about healing, honor, and family that influence group work. By examining their own beliefs about how people learn and change from a cultural perspective as well as a theoretical orientation, group leaders can begin to understand how people from diverse cultures may view group process. Effective group leadership enables members to understand themselves and others as individuals within a cultural context. Multicultural and diversity issues are inherent in all group work, and DeLucia-Waack suggests that "group leaders choose interventions and methods of change based on the interplay between individuals and their worldviews" (p. 193).

The goals and processes of the group should match the cultural values of the members of that group. If you model genuine respect for the differences among members in your groups, all the group members will benefit from this cultural diversity. Be aware of hesitation on a client's part, and do not be too quick to interpret it. We often remind our students that it is our job as therapists to remain invested in the process with our clients while maintaining an openness about the outcome of our clients' decisions and lives. They must live with the consequences of their actions, not us.

Your willingness to put yourself in situations where you can learn about different cultures outside of your role as the leader can help you recognize your blind spots and assumptions and learn where you may need to do more work.

It is important for leaders to avoid treating members in ways that make them feel as if they have to teach you all about their culture. On numerous occasions, we have heard group members talk about feeling frustrated with having to educate others about their culture or being placed in the position of being the expert on all people from their cultural background. Leaders need to strike a balance between learning from each individual about his or her specific experiences and extending themselves outside of the group to gain useful information that will make them more culturally effective leaders.

A Personal Perspective on Understanding Differences

My (Cindy's) identity development exploration has been instrumental in finding a way to successfully work with people from backgrounds much different from my own. It is crucial for me to understand how I see the world as well as how others may see the same world through a very different lens and context. I have learned that I cannot attempt to prove myself too quickly to clients who differ from me; rather, I have to trust the process and allow the relationship between us to unfold. It is much more what I do rather than what I say that gains the respect and trust of diverse group members. I am often told by my students of color that when they first see me they have a level of mistrust because they see a "privileged White woman" who is not likely to understand them or care about their causes. I am acutely aware that these students bring their past experiences with other White people to their initial interactions with me, and I know it will not be helpful for me to be defensive or take too personally their initial reactions to me. As the process of our getting to know one another unfolds, their attitudes toward me often shift as they begin to feel understood and cared for in spite of our obvious differences.

Through teaching multicultural counseling courses, I have learned that each person is at a different place with regard to her or his process of learning about diversity. My journey toward cultural effectiveness will look quite different from that of my Latino American or African American colleagues. Although we are likely to struggle with some similar issues, our histories, worldviews, and context for understanding complex diversity issues are different. Just as group members are at very different stages of their cultural awareness and identity development, so are counseling students. These differences can provide a powerful catalyst for learning if they are explored in the group.

Numerous clinicians have expressed that they face challenges in trying to develop and establish trust with diverse clients and group members. I (Cindy) too find this to be true, but there is enormous satisfaction in being able to work through these initial feelings with group members and to be a small part of helping to heal the damage that has been done to many people from diverse cultural backgrounds. The key is to be clear with myself about my own identity, its impact on others, and to continually work to keep my "isms" in check so that my personal issues do not hinder the work of group members. It is paramount that group leaders know where their blind spots are and work hard to develop those areas so that our clients do not become our main source of education around issues of diversity.

Multicultural and Social Justice Counseling Competencies LO6

The helping professions continue to emphasize a monocultural approach to training and practice, leaving many helpers ill prepared to deal effectively with cultural diversity (Sue & Sue, 2013). Although referral is sometimes an appropriate course of action, it is not a solution to the problem of inadequately trained practitioners. Referrals based on value conflicts between leaders and members are considered inappropriate and unethical. Moreover, the helper's limited knowledge of a cultural group is not grounds for referral, as this can be remediated through continuing education and supervision or consultation.

It is unrealistic to expect professionals to have an in-depth knowledge of all cultural backgrounds, yet it is feasible to have a comprehensive grasp of general principles for working successfully with culturally diverse clients. If you are open to the values inherent in a diversity perspective, you will find ways to avoid encapsulation. Developing competence in multicultural and social justice counseling is a lifelong endeavor.

Our views about diversity competence have been influenced by the work of a number of writers who have developed documents on multicultural counseling competence. Sue, Arredondo, and McDavis (1992) developed a conceptual framework for multicultural counseling competencies and standards in three areas. The first area deals with the helper's self-awareness regarding their beliefs and attitudes about race, culture, gender, and sexual orientation. The second dimension involves knowledge and understanding of the worldview of the helper and specific knowledge of the diverse groups with whom he or she works. The third area deals with skills and intervention strategies needed to serve diverse client groups. The Multicultural and Social Justice Counseling Competencies (Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development [AMCD], 2015) endorsed by the AMCD and the American Counseling Association in 2015 represents a revision and expansion of the original multicultural counseling competencies proposed by Sue, Arredondo, and McDavis (1992). The ASGW (1999, 2012) has adopted two documents on multicultural competence: "Principles for Diversity-Competent Group Workers" and "Multicultural and Social Justice Competence Principles for Group Workers." These standards serve as a model, reflecting the goals related to becoming culturally competent group practitioners. For an updated version of these competencies, see Multicultural and Social Justice Counseling Competencies (AMCD, 2015).

We have condensed the multicultural and social justice counseling competencies identified by these documents and adapted them for use by group practitioners. We prefer the term culturally skilled group counselor because we view effectively working with diverse individuals as a journey rather than a destination. The guidelines that follow describe areas of effective practice in multicultural and diversity settings. Use them to assess your strengths and to identify areas in which you need to acquire additional knowledge and skills.

Beliefs and Attitudes of Culturally Skilled Group Workers Effective group leaders recognize and understand their own stereotypes and preconceived notions about other racial and ethnic groups. They are aware of both direct and indirect ways in which they may communicate a lack of cultural responsiveness to diverse group members. Culturally skilled group workers:

- Acknowledge their assumptions, values, beliefs, and biases, and at the same time avoid imposing their worldview on members of their groups.
- Do not allow their personal biases, values, or problems to interfere with their ability to work with clients who are culturally different from them.
- Are aware of how their own cultural background and experiences have influenced attitudes, values, and biases about what constitutes psychologically healthy individuals.
- Have moved from being unaware to being increasingly aware of their own race, ethnic and cultural heritage, gender, socioeconomic status, social identities, sexual orientation, abilities, and spiritual beliefs, and to valuing and respecting differences.
- Seek to examine and understand the worldview of their clients. They respect clients' religious and spiritual beliefs and values.
- Recognize the sources of their discomfort with differences between themselves and others in terms of race, ethnicity, culture, and beliefs and strive to develop the knowledge of how to work through the discomfort that comes with learning about matters such as power, privilege, and oppression.
- Have awareness of and knowledge of clients' worldviews, assumptions, attitudes, values, beliefs, biases, and experiences with power, privilege, and oppression. Group leaders who welcome diverse value orientations and diverse assumptions about human behavior have a basis for sharing the worldview of their clients as opposed to being culturally encapsulated.
- Accept and value cultural diversity rather than insist that their cultural heritage is superior. They are able to identify and understand the central cultural constructs of the members of their groups, and they avoid applying their own cultural constructs inappropriately with these group members.
- Monitor their functioning through consultation, supervision, and further training or education. They realize that group counseling may not be appropriate for all clients or for all problems. They are aware of systemic barriers that create injustices in society.

We strongly encourage group leaders to increase their cultural effectiveness and responsiveness toward all of their clients by engaging in processes that challenge them intellectually, politically, emotionally, and psychologically.

Knowledge of Culturally Skilled Group Workers Culturally skilled group practitioners possess knowledge about their own racial and cultural heritage and how it affects them in their work. In addition, effective group workers:

- Understand how oppression, racism, discrimination, and stereotyping affect them personally and professionally. They do not impose their expectations on clients from differing cultural backgrounds, and they avoid stereotyping clients.
- Understand the worldview of their clients and learn about their clients' cultural backgrounds. Because they understand the basic values underlying the therapeutic group process, they know how these values may clash with the cultural values of diverse groups.
- Are aware of the institutional barriers that prevent marginalized people from actively utilizing various resources.

- Possess specific knowledge and information about the group members with whom they are working. This includes at least a general knowledge of the values, life experiences, family structures, cultural heritage, and historical background of their culturally different group members.
- Are knowledgeable about the community characteristics and the resources in the community as well as in the family.
- View diversity in a positive light, which enables them to meet and resolve challenges that arise in their work with a wide range of client populations.

Skills and Intervention Strategies of Culturally Skilled Group Workers Effective group counselors possess a wide range of skills that they are able to use with diverse client populations. Culturally skilled group workers:

- Familiarize themselves with relevant research and the latest findings regarding mental health issues that affect diverse client populations.
- Actively seek out educational experiences that foster their knowledge and skills for facilitating groups across differences.
- Are able to use methods and strategies and define goals consistent with the life experiences and cultural values of the group members. They are able to modify and adapt their interventions in a group to accommodate cultural differences.
- Are not anchored to one method or approach to group facilitation and recognize that helping styles may be culture bound. They are able to use a variety of culturally appropriate and relevant interventions, which may include consulting with traditional healers and religious and spiritual healers.
- Are able to become actively involved with clients outside the group setting (community events, celebrations, social and political functions, and neighborhood groups).
- Take responsibility for educating group members about how groups function and use sound ethical practice when facilitating groups with a diverse membership.
- Take action by collaborating with clients to identify the factors that influence the therapeutic relationship.
- Take action by inviting conversations about how culture, stereotypes, prejudice, discrimination, power, privilege, and oppression influence the therapeutic relationship with privileged and marginalized clients.

This is a good time to take an inventory of your current level of awareness, knowledge, and skills that have a bearing on your ability to function effectively in multicultural situations. Reflect on these questions:

- In what ways does your own culture influence the way you think, feel, and act?
- How prepared are you to understand and work with clients of different cultural backgrounds? Do you feel more or less comfortable working with particular groups? How might you increase your comfort level and skills with these groups?
- What kind of awareness, knowledge, and skills do you think you need to work effectively in groups with diverse client populations?

Copyright 2018 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. WCN 02-200-202

- What kinds of life experiences have you had that will better enable you to understand and counsel people who have a different worldview?
- Can you identify any areas of cultural bias that could inhibit your ability to work effectively with people who are different from you? If so, what steps might you take to challenge your biases?
- Are you familiar with how various cultural groups perceive or respond to people from your cultural group as well as those from their own cultural and ethnic identity group? How would you feel if a client shared these reactions or stereotypes with you?
- If you were to ask the people who know you most intimately, what biases, prejudices, or value judgments might they identify that could interfere with your ability to maintain neutrality in your work as a counselor?
- What specific strengths do you possess regarding understanding your own cultural background?
- How can your strengths be applied to increasing your effectiveness in working with diversity in group work?
- What are some steps you are willing to take to become a more culturally skilled group leader?

Inviting Conversations About Culture With Group Members

One way to actively incorporate a multicultural dimension into your group leadership is to initiate open discussions with the members of your groups about issues around cultural differences. Group members may be reluctant to talk with people outside of their cultural group about certain topics. Ask members if they are hesitant to raise certain topics within the group and what contributes to this reluctance. Confronting these silent issues can serve as a catalyst for meaningful and often difficult dialogue. Another way to acknowledge cultural differences is illustrated in this situation: A Persian woman is talking about feeling lonely and isolated, yet she does not mention any connection to culture. The group leader asks, "Do you think that your cultural identity or affiliation relates in any way to your feelings of loneliness or isolation?" This question invites discussion of the topic if it resonates with her, yet it also gives space for her to disagree. In addition, the leader has modeled to other members that we can talk about sensitive topics. There have been times when I (Marianne) have initiated conversations with Jewish clients about the fact that I am German, especially when I sensed they were having reactions to me. They are not likely to trust me if I represent a symbol of the atrocities inflicted upon their ancestors. Although I do not have to accept direct responsibility for these historical events, it is important that I listen nondefensively and empathically to what these clients have to say to me.

The inability to talk honestly about race and racial issues can be a major hindrance to effective multicultural counseling (D. W. Sue, 2016). When discussions about race are poorly handled, the result is often misunderstanding, increased antagonism among participants, and barriers to learning. When race talk is skillfully handled, Sue believes it can improve communication, facilitate learning and dialogue, enhance racial harmony, and expand awareness of one's racial and cultural identity. Sue identified five successful strategies to facilitate difficult conversations about culture and race:

- Understand your own racial and cultural identity.
- Recognize and be open about your racial biases.
- Encourage a discussion about feelings.
- Pay more attention to the process than to the content of race talk.
- Encourage and support people who are willing to take the risk of expressing themselves. (pp. 45–46)

Sue points out that counseling professionals can turn tricky racial and cultural conversations into teachable moments if they are willing to challenge the silence that often surrounds race and culture. Culturally skilled group leaders take the initiative to provide a safe climate for honest expression of experiences and views among people from diverse backgrounds.

Cardemil and Battle (2003) contend that conversations about culture with members enhance the therapeutic relationship and promote better treatment outcomes. We believe their recommendations can be applied to your work as a facilitator of many different kinds of groups:

- Suspend preconceptions about the race or ethnicity of clients or their family members. Avoid making incorrect assumptions about group members that could impede the development of the therapeutic relationship. During the early stage of a group, ask members how they identify culturally and ethnically.
- If you engage group members in conversations about culture and ethnicity, there is less chance of stereotyping and making faulty assumptions.
- Be aware that the more comfortable you are with conversations about race, culture, sexual orientation, and ethnicity, the more easily group members can respond appropriately to others who may be uncomfortable with such discussions.
- Address how differences between you and the members of your group might affect the process and outcomes of the group. Although it is not possible to identify every between-group difference that could surface during the course of therapy, the critical element is your willingness to consider the relevance of racial or ethnic differences with members.
- Recognize and acknowledge how power, privilege, and oppression can affect interactions with clients. Discussing these topics is invaluable in strengthening relationships within the group.
- Be open to ongoing learning about ways that cultural factors affect group work. Although acquiring knowledge about various racial and ethnic groups is important, it is not enough. It is essential that you be willing to identify and examine your own worldview, assumptions, and personal prejudices about other racial and ethnic groups. Know that this skill does not develop quickly or without effort and that you will be refining your skill throughout your career as a counselor.

Group leaders address ethnic and cultural differences between leaders and members in a variety of ways. Some ignore the difference unless members raise the concern, some ask members how they feel about the difference, and others talk directly with members about their own sense of the differences present in the room. Leaders need to be flexible in their approach to discussions of cultural differences and invite discussion on multiple levels. The initial step is to communicate verbally that you are aware of the diversity within the room and that it will likely have an impact on the relationship and connections that are formed. However, the crucial part is in your actions. Members watch what we do as much as they attend to what we say. They often pay close attention to what we communicate nonverbally as they have learned to read nonverbal language to ascertain what people really think and feel. If we miss opportunities to address cultural differences or make assumptions about gender roles, sexual identity, social identity, and cultural identity, we are communicating to members that we are not likely to understand their experiential world.

Members watch what we do as much as they attend to what we say.

To initiate conversations with group members about their cultural identity, it is necessary to have some fundamental understanding about the members' ethnic and cultural backgrounds. We need to carefully listen to group members as they talk about relevant differences and the meaning these differences hold for them. Again, members will provide us with the information we need to work effectively with them if we give them this opportunity and if we create a climate in which they feel safe to do so.

In working with culturally diverse individuals within a group, it helps to assess the degree of acculturation and identity development that has taken place. This is especially true for individuals who have had the experience of living in another culture. Immigrants often have allegiance to their own home culture but find certain characteristics of their new culture attractive. They may experience conflicts when integrating the values from the two cultures in which they live. These core struggles can be productively explored in an accepting group if the leader and the other members respect this cultural conflict.

One group member we worked with talked about his struggle to be more talkative during sessions. He said that he felt pressured to share himself in a way with the group that was extremely foreign and uncomfortable to him. He remarked that if he starts to open up and share his feelings, when he returns to his homeland he will not know when to stop and will likely be disapproved of by his people. This is a common struggle that members from a variety of ethnic groups might face: success in one area directly contradicts what success looks like in the member's cultural of origin.

I (Marianne) live between two cultures. When I am in Germany, I tend to use fewer words to get my message across. When I speak English, I am more verbose. Around Americans, I am more likely to disclose feelings and personal information to people other than my family. These disclosures would be frowned upon in Germany. In moving between two cultures, I am aware of making these adjustments because the consequences of what I say and how I say it differ between these two cultures. Years ago, when I participated in a therapy group as a recent immigrant, I felt very embarrassed when others disclosed personal information about their family, and I was extremely uncomfortable when asked to make myself known in a similar fashion. The challenge for both the leader and the member is to help that person find a way to define what openness might look like for him or her in both settings. How does this person want to be different, if at all?

Recognizing Our Limitations We do not always recognize when our lack of competence is coming into play, so it is crucial for us to be open to feedback from both colleagues and clients. When necessary, it is paramount that we actively seek consultation and supervision, as well as additional resources, to address our limitations, and think critically about how our own actions may be contributing to a lack of progress in a group. The most effective way of working toward cultural competence is to engage in a variety of experiential activities and personal growth opportunities that take the learning from the head to the heart. If we do not walk our talk, all the cultural knowledge in the world will not serve us or the group members with whom we work. The more able we are to immerse ourselves in culturally diverse and rich environments, the more likely we are to enhance our multicultural responsiveness.

If you are working with clients from a specific ethnic, racial, and cultural background different from your own, you can benefit from reading chapters in books and journal articles addressing group work with diverse client populations. Some resources we recommend, which are found in the References and Suggested Readings at the end of the book, are Chung and Bemak (2014); DeLucia-Waack (2010, 2014); DeLucia-Waack, Kalodner, and Riva (2014); Ivey, Pedersen, and Ivey (2008); McWhirter and Robbins (2014); Pope, Pangelinan, and Coker (2011); Salazar (2009); Singh and Salazar (2010a, 2010b, 2010c); Steen, Shi, and Hockersmith, (2014); Sue and Sue (2013); Torres Rivera, Torres Fernandez, and Hendricks (2014), and Vacha-Haase (2014).

Points to Remember

Introduction to Group Work: A Multicultural Perspective

Here are some key points to remember; many of the following chapters are built on these basic concepts.

- Groups have much to offer, but training in both core and specialty competencies is essential to design and facilitate successful groups in a variety of settings.
- There are different types of group work—task groups, psychoeducational groups, group counseling, and group psychotherapy—and each of these involves specific training in both core and specialization competencies. The goals of the group, the leader's role, and functions of members vary depending on the type of group work being considered.
- Brief group therapy is beneficial for both economic and theoretical reasons.
- Brief group counseling is popular in both community agencies and school settings because of the realistic time constraints and the ability of a brief format to be incorporated into both educational and therapeutic programs.
- Pay attention to the diversity that exists within your group, and help members recognize how their diverse backgrounds influence their values and behavior. Highlight cultural themes as they surface during a session.

- Effective delivery of group work involves taking group members' racial and cultural identity into account. Your challenge is to modify your strategies to fit the differing needs of the diverse members of your group.
- To become a culturally skilled group worker, you need to possess a range of knowledge and skills to intervene appropriately. Seek avenues for consultation and supervision as you recognize your limits in understanding diverse groups.
- Skill does not develop quickly; you will be refining your skills throughout your career as a counselor.

Exercises

The exercises at the end of each chapter can be done on your own or in class in small groups. The goal is to provide you with an opportunity to experience techniques, issues, group processes, and potential problems that can occur at various stages of a group's development. As you read the exercises at the end of each chapter, focus on those that are most meaningful to you.

Questions for Discussion

1. What experiences have you had with groups, and how might these experiences influence the attitudes you bring to this group course?
2. What kind of group would you be most interested in forming and leading?
3. What do you think are some of the advantages of a group format for delivering services?
4. Are groups suitable for all client populations? How might you modify the group structure to fit the needs of members of a particular group you are interested in designing?
5. If you were setting up a group composed of culturally diverse members, what factors would you consider?
6. What specific steps could you take to facilitate difficult conversations about race and culture that emerge in your groups?
7. How aware are you of how your cultural background is likely to influence your ability to work with a diverse range of people? What specific attitudes and beliefs might enhance or interfere with your ability to understand and work with diversity?

Guide to Groups in Action: Evolution and Challenges DVD and Workbook

1. A self-study video program and workbook combination titled Groups in Action: Evolution and Challenges DVD and Workbook may be used in your course as part of an integrated learning package. Throughout the book you will see an end of chapter box like this one suggesting how to make the best use of Groups in Action. The Groups in Action DVD and Workbook resources are also available in an alternative, online format through Cengage Learning's Counseling MindTap website. If you did not receive either a DVD or a Printed Access Card packaged with your book, you can purchase access to these resources at www.cengagebrain.com. Check with your professor first to find out if the online resources are required.

If you are using the Groups in Action: Evolution and Challenges DVD and Workbook, you can integrate some of the key ideas in this chapter with the DVD. Refer to a section in this chapter on "Becoming a Culturally Skilled Group Counselor" and review the salient issues discussed. In the Challenges Facing Group Leaders DVD, a program segment entitled "Challenges of Addressing Diversity Issues" illustrates various situations that most group leaders would find challenging. The scenarios that are enacted within the group provide an action-oriented picture of the skills needed to effectively address a variety of diversity themes, some of which are listed below.

- What does my culture have to do with my identity?
- I feel different from others in here.
- Sometimes I want to exclude others.
- I struggle with language.
- I resent being stereotyped.
- We are alike and we are different.
- I express myself better in my native language.
- I am colorblind.
- I know little about my culture.
- I want more answers from you leaders.

Each of the above themes is enacted in the DVD program and elaborated upon in the workbook. We suggest that you first answer the questions in the workbook dealing with each theme and then use your responses as the basis for discussion in small groups.
